Abstract

Investment is one way to develop existing funds and gain future profits within a certain period of time. (Roy & Joseph, 2018) confirms the benefits achieved in terms of allocating funds are also known as yields/returns. Yields can be in the form of dividends, interest, coupons, and capital gains. For example, in terms of deposit investment, the public will receive interest that will be sent regularly because it has a low risk. Government Securities/SUN such as Bonds and Sukuk also provide yields in the form of coupons within a certain period of time and are sent regularly. In contrast to stocks, stock investment can provide benefits from the distribution of dividends by the company as a result of the profit that occurs and the difference in buying and selling prices. Whatever the yield given, investments that are denoted as allocations of funds in the long term will generally provide benefits for investors.
